Pawan Dhingra's Research

Race and Immigration

One of Dhingra's primary research interests is the intersection of race and immigration. He has conducted extensive studies on the experiences of Asian Americans and other immigrant groups in the United States. His research has documented the challenges and opportunities faced by immigrants as they navigate the complexities of American society.

Dhingra's research has also shed light on the complex relationship between race and immigration. He argues that race is a social construct that has been used throughout history to justify discrimination and inequality. He challenges the myth of a single, monolithic Asian American identity, demonstrating the vast diversity within the Asian American population.

The American Dream

Another central theme of Dhingra's research is the American Dream. He has explored the ways in which the American Dream has been shaped by race, class, and gender. His work has shown that the American Dream is not a universal experience and that it has often been out of reach for marginalized communities.

Dhingra argues that the American Dream needs to be reimagined for the 21st century. He calls for a more inclusive and equitable society, where all Americans have the opportunity to achieve their dreams, regardless of their race, gender, or background.

The American Dream: What It Is and What It Isn't

Published in 2017, The American Dream: What It Is and What It Isn't is a thought-provoking exploration of the American Dream.
