The 2016 US presidential election was one of the most consequential in recent history. It resulted in the election of Donald Trump, a political outsider with no prior experience in government, over Hillary Clinton, a seasoned politician who had served as Secretary of State under President Barack Obama.

Clinton was the favorite to win the election, but Trump ultimately prevailed in a stunning upset. This article will take a look at the factors that contributed to Clinton's failed campaign and Trump's victory.

Clinton's Campaign Strategy

Clinton's campaign strategy was based on the assumption that she would win the popular vote by a large margin and that this would be enough to secure her the presidency. She focused her campaign on issues such as healthcare, education, and climate change, which she believed would appeal to a broad range of voters.

However, Clinton's campaign failed to take into account the growing anger and frustration among many Americans, particularly in rural areas. These voters were drawn to Trump's message of change and his promises to bring back jobs and restore America's greatness.

Trump's Campaign Strategy

Trump's campaign strategy was based on exploiting the anger and frustration of many Americans. He promised to build a wall on the Mexican border, renegotiate trade deals, and repeal Obamacare. He also appealed to voters' fears about terrorism and immigration.

Trump's campaign was also helped by the fact that he was able to tap into a vein of nationalism and populism that had been growing in the United States for several years. He was able to connect with voters who felt that the country was going in the wrong direction and that the political establishment was not listening to their concerns.

The Electoral College

One of the key factors that contributed to Trump's victory was the Electoral College. The Electoral College is a system in which each state is assigned a certain number of electors based on its population. The candidate who wins the popular vote in a state wins all of that state's electors.

In 2016, Trump won the Electoral College by a margin of 306 to 232, even though Clinton won the popular vote by nearly 3 million votes. This was due to the fact that Trump won several key swing states, such as Pennsylvania, Michigan, and Wisconsin, by narrow margins.

The Comey Letter

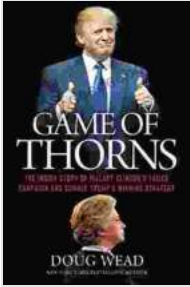

Another factor that contributed to Clinton's defeat was the release of a letter by FBI Director James Comey just 11 days before the election. In the letter, Comey announced that the FBI was reopening its investigation into Clinton's use of a private email server while she was Secretary of State.

The release of the letter came at a critical time in the campaign and it had a significant impact on Clinton's poll numbers. Many voters were concerned about the possibility that Clinton could be indicted after the election, and this led some of them to vote for Trump instead.

The 2016 US presidential election was a major upset. Hillary Clinton was the favorite to win, but Donald Trump ultimately prevailed in a stunning victory. There were a number of factors that contributed to Clinton's defeat, including her campaign strategy, Trump's campaign strategy, the Electoral College, and the Comey letter.

The 2016 election was a reminder that anything can happen in politics. It also showed that the American people are hungry for change. Donald Trump promised to bring change to Washington, and many Americans were willing to give him a chance.
